RECONFIGURATION OF ELECTRIC DISTRIBUTION SYSTEMS Hugh Rudnick 1 Ildefonso Harnisch 2 Ra Sanhueza ABSTRACT A methodology to reconfigure an electric power distribution network under normal operating conditions to reduce the active losses of the network or to balance the load of the system's feeders is presented. An heuristic solution algorithm is used.

The authors of this article choose the reconfiguration of the distribution network of the Beninese Company of Electrical energy (SBEE) by moving the switches open on the network. The method exploited by the authors is the topological optimization which requires the topo-

One important area in which distribution automation is being applied is the area of network reconfiguration. Network reconfiguration refers to the closing and opening of switches in a power distribution system in order to alter the network topology, and thus the flow of power from the substation to the customers.

NETWORK RECONFIGURATION FOR LOSS REDUCTION IN THREE-PHASE

Distribution networks reconfiguration (DNR) is the process of changing the topology of distribution systems by altering the open/closed status of switches to transfer loads among the feeders.

methods and algorithms to solve the reconfiguration problem as a single objective problem. Usually, active power losses are adopted as the main objective [5-10]. However, according to today's demand for electric power, single objective optimization is not enough to satisfy the requirements for distribution systems.
